How I am writing a thesis from bed...
Confined to my bedroom, my productivity has been tested like never before. Under normal conditions I would be doing most school work in this space. However, being forced to stay put makes it entirely different. Here is what I discovered about the beauty of quarantine for my thesis and my written voice generally. Working on my thesis forces me to reflect on my opinions, ideas, and critiques. I am able to draw on my own creativity because I have to image the world not as it is now.

YOUR VOICE

Having a clear and compelling voice that is unique to your writing is a true gift. We all possess the ability to write in this way and create work that is uniquely our own. Use your time in this distancing to discover what you want to say and how. Take time to understand the narrative you have and what your internal monologue really sounds like.

NEXT STEPS...

Use this time to untangle your self worth from your productivity and write something that feels cathartic or necessary. Trust me, when it’s not homework, writing can be liberating. See a few creative prompts here:
If you could create your own day of awareness, what would it be for?
When do you feel most connected to other people?
What is the most intense dream you’ve ever had?